John Wanamaker knows the value of printer's ink, and after spending many hundreds of thousands to make himself a national reputation as a leading department store magnate, he has just closed a contract with the New York Evening Post for one full page a day for five years. When such a man contracts for 350 pages of advertising he is putting more money into one contract than most of the country stores represent in their total capital, and he knows that it will be returned several fold.
